How Malays Get Fire

From Compressed Air The inhabitants of the Malay peninsula have a method of obtaining fire which is probably unique among primitive peoples. They utilize the printire, but one which it is most surprising to find in the possession of a group of aborigines. A tiny pump of wood, hardly more than three inches in length and with a bore of about haif an inch, is used, says the New York World. This pump is open at one end, closed at the other In it fits closely a plunger equipped with a round knob at one end and a piston-like expansion at the other. The piston end of the plunger is dipped in tinder, which the native carries in a moth's cocoon, which makes an absolutely watertight container. The piston is placed in the pump and the knob struck sharply. the temperature to such a degree that This method is quicker by far than Mrs. Golden's folks.
